

This is not my Alaska.

"We have many regular guests who come each year to enjoy the great fishing in Alaska. But more and more, I have people telling me they won't come to a state that allows this to go on. Aerial hunting is bad for business and bad for Alaska's image."

Brooke Edwards, Professional Guide, Alaska Wildland Adventures

This is not my America.

Alaska is truly our nation's last frontier. It is also the last place in the U.S. where a few hunters still use aircraft to chase and kill wolves. They shoot these animals from the air or chase them to exhaustion before landing and shooting them point blank.

Thirty five years ago, Congress put an end to aerial hunting. But Alaska is exploiting a loophole in federal law to resume the practice, not only for wolves, but bears as well. Hundreds of scientists have condemned what Alaska is doing, even as other states threaten to follow Alaska's lead.

It's time to stop aerial hunting once and for all.

www.defenders.org/airborne_hunting

Support the Protect America's Wildlife (PAW) Act