

This is not my Alaska.

"The wolf is a vital part of native Alaskan culture and we have been coexisting with wolves for hundreds of years. What the state government is doing is upsetting the natural balance of things and jeopardizing Alaska's well-deserved image as a wildlife frontier."

Lorraine Ramsey, Alaska Native

This is not my America.

Alaska is truly our nation's last frontier. It is also the last place in the U.S. where a few hunters still use aircraft to chase and kill wolves. They shoot these animals from the air or chase them to exhaustion before landing and shooting them point blank.

Thirty five years ago, Congress put an end to aerial hunting. But Alaska is exploiting a loophole in federal law to resume the practice, not only for wolves, but bears as well. Hundreds of scientists have condemned what Alaska is doing, even as other states threaten to follow Alaska's lead.

It's time to stop aerial hunting once and for all.

www.defenders.org/airborne_hunting

Support the Protect America's Wildlife (PAW) Act